A POOR ESTIMATE OF COWPER.

Any one whose lot it is to write upon the life and works of Cowper must feel that there is an immense difference between the interest which attaches to him and that which attaches to any one among the far greater poets of the succeeding age. Still, there is something about him so attractive; his voice has such a silver tone; he retains, even in his ashes, such a faculty of winning friends, that his biographer and crific may be easily beguiled into giving him too high place. He belongs to a particular religious movement, with the vitality of which the interest of a great part of his works has departed or is departing. Still more emphatically and in a still more important sense, does he belong to Christianity. In no natural struggle for exweak things of selection wo oca of selection would be ever by ence and the measure of worth, Cowper we be cast aside as a specimen of despicable infirmity, and all who have said anything in his praise will be treated with the same scorn, —Goldwin from Remsen, Oneida County, under date c May 25, says : "Some weeks since a member of my family was presented with a term black bird,' a species well known to your rural read ers. The bird had been slightly wounded on the tip of his wing by shot. It was a splendid specimen and was caged and well cared for. upper window; within a few feet of the position is a robin's nest, previously located. Between the prisoner and the robins there was evidently no love, as it seemed no secret to the latter that their sable neighbor was a despoiler of birds eggs and their downy product, and for days the and as faithful'y as they feed their young in the can account for this strange conduct? be that the robins comprehended the helpices captivity of their caged neighbor and are moved thereby to sublime deeds !

ROBIN NATURE.
